NEWS FOR VETERANS

With the aid of the movie camera, a Veterans Administration psychiatrist is compiling an extensive study of human expression.

Fleeting changes of face, voice, gait, stance, and gesture of hospitalized mental patients are captured on film by Dr. Erwin W. Straus, of the Lexington, Ky., VA hospital, in his search for a better understanding of mental breakdown.

Later he analyzes the films — by using a special viewer to look at the individual pictures or "frames," or by running the footage in slow-motion.

Many thousands of feet of these films, made during the eight years of Dr. Straus' study, are in laboratory files of the Lexington VA hospital, where he is director of professional education and research.

He is hopeful that his studies of expression may lead to a better understanding of mental breakdowns in terms other than those of physiology, and thus contribute to more effective treatment of mental disease.

Dr. Straus considers a patient's outward expressions and movements a reliable index to his mental states, sometimes more so than his words, since it usually is difficult to dissemble one's expressions.

He also pointed out that many mental patients are not able to communicate through words at all.

An exhibit picturing Dr. Straus' research has been shown at meetings of the American Psychiatric Association, the American Medical Association, and the Kentucky State Medical Association.

In this exhibit, he reinforces his observations with references to works of art that depict mental states or aberrations. Included are reproductions of gestures, expressions, and body movements from pictures by Michelangelo, Rembrandt, Toulouse-Lautrec, and Picasso.

Big business needs very little help from the average citizen; it is powerful enough to take care of itself.

You can travel all around the world and you will find no better people than the neighbors in your home town.

Health and Beauty

Air pollution has become a matter of national concern. Many communities have become so concerned that it is against the law to burn leaves and garbage in the backyard. Federal authorities are pushing broad research aimed at alleviating air pollution. Auto industry is seeking to design motor exhausts to eliminate some harmful gases now filling the atmosphere.

There are cases where industrial fumes have changed the color of paint on homes overnight. If it is possible to change the color of housepaint from white to black in a period of some twelve hours, think what harm must be being done to the human body!

The amount of harm being done by air pollution is not known, but to quote one authority, "All we seem to know is that, like eating dirt, air pollution is not good for us."

Certain clinical experiments have been said to show that gases and debris which sometimes float in the atmosphere can produce cancers. Some say there is a possible link between automobile exhaust and cancer.

Among substances which we are told may cause cancers in animals are arsenic, mustard gas, benzol, tar, asphalt, creosote oil, carbon black, paraffin oil, chromium, and numerous other chemicals and mixtures.

Air pollution is a result of our industrial way of life and living in the cramped conditions of city dwelling. Something can be done to make our air more healthful. The first thing to do is to determine exactly which pollutants in the air of your community are harmful. Remember that there is no known way to make the air completely pure, but efforts should be made toward removing the most harmful pollutants.

Industrial plants can be encouraged to install collectors, filters, to reduce air pollution.
